Looking for updated complaint numbers

While more attention than ever is being paid to sexual violence on post-secondary campuses across North America, Niagara College lacks up-to-date statistics on how many students have made complaints in recent years.

According to Hafsa Shaikh, the college's student rights and responsibilities officer, amendments made to the Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities Act requires post-secondary institutions to report "information about sexual violence to the Minister of Advanced Education and Skills Development as well as to report on the support available to students who experience sexual violence."

However, Niagara College has nothing to make public.

"At this time, we (the college) do not have recent statistics and are awaiting ministry clarifications on reporting requirements," said Shaikh.

When asked why the college does not have recent statistics, Shaikh responded: "At the moment, I don't have the statistics reported within the last three years."

Cost of strike at $4 million: College

By IRYNA RYBCHAK

Niagara College was left with black ink in its financial ledgers, following a five-week strike last fall.

Niagara News has learned the college saved $4.27 million during the strike, while paying out just over $4 million in strike-related expenses.

That means the college benefited to the tune of about $230,000.

Last week, Michael Audibert, co-ordinator for the Board of Governors, said, "this number includes the salary/compensation savings from the strike ($4.27 million) minus the tuition refunds and other strike-related expenses and lost revenue ($4.04 million)."

In the Jan. 26 edition, Michael Wales, senior communications officer at Niagara College, couldn't detail the amount of money saved and spent on the strike.

He said at the time, "in terms of a surplus, applications for the fund will be accepted until April 27, so it's too early to predict how much will be paid out."

A spokesman for the Ontario Public Service Employees Union (OPSEU) Local 242, declined comment about the savings and expenditures related to the strike.
